Words to ponder

There is wisdom in the Zen saying that sees in doubt an open door for growth through awakening:

*Great doubt – great awakening
Little doubt – little awakening
No doubt – no awakening*

Thought for the week.

What you allow.
is what will continue.

What are you grateful about today/this week?

I am grateful that we are moving forward and not moving towards locking down again any time soon. So many parts of the world still face this uncertainty. So I am pleased to see in Queensland that we are getting on with our lives. Even though the weather is a little chilly in the morning, it is starting to warm up.

How to live the Gospel out this weekend.

The wisdom in today's reading comes back to reliability and faithfulness, and shouldn't these qualities characterize our every thought and action. There are commentators who say we are living in a post-truth world when it is so hard to put trust in the words of public figures and news media. And yet history shows we are no different from our equivalents in previous ages. We humans have a marvellous ability to kid ourselves. Truth seems to be the chief casualty of power. Peddling fictions is the way to preserve power, and a lie repeated over and over morphs into the kind of 'truth' that serves power. JRR Tolkien offered a different point of view and maintained that the most effective medium of truth is the fantasy story. But this only works as long as the receiver knows the story is fantasy and its truths lie beneath the scaffolding of the fiction. Jesus practised the same narrative technique inventing fiction in his parables to convey life-giving truths. Here is a case where honest fact-checking would enable us to see through the surface fiction to the truth underneath. Today's Scripture points us beyond knowledge to wisdom, wisdom that can be authenticated by experience and the lives of people of integrity, bearing mind that integrity is a life based on values and not on personal gain or looking good.
